Create masking layers for all sorts of purposes, from blocking out objects to tracing an image. A layer is a document workspace; any document can be made into a layer or shape. You use layers to mask off areas or make other effects on a work. Each layer can have multiple layers stacked on top of it or overlaid on it. You can cut and paste layer features, including text, layers, and images. You can also change the opacity (transparency) of a layer, change the blend mode, and add a drop shadow to any layer. You can scale and rotate layers, move and change the position of layers, and use filters and bevels to alter layer appearance. Many layers can be combined, including the controls for converting layers to paths (such as selections), completely erasing layers, and deleting layers. You can add layer styles for everything from text to shading and blending and create clipping paths that mask unwanted areas of an image. With layers, you can make effects that are kind of like recreating effects that you can find in digital cameras, including grain and pixelation effects, sepia tones, and removing red-eye. When you finish an image, save it for the first time, you can open the Save As dialog box and save it as a layered file, thus preserving all the layers and making them accessible.

Layers When you make a document in Photoshop, you start with only one layer, called the Background layer. Figure 14-1 shows a document that has just one layer, the Background layer. You can see the Background layer at the top of the workspace. Figure 14-1: All layers start out as the Background layer. After you add more layers, the Background layer becomes hidden. To use a layer, you need to bring it out of the background and reveal it. You can turn layers off or on with a check box on the Layers panel. After you bring out a layer, you can hide it again in the same way by turning off the check box, and you can bring it back to the background if you want to make a change. (Check the box to keep a layer or to turn it off.) You can add, make, and remove layer styles. Layer styles change the characteristics of a layer or an entire image. You can apply the default attributes of a layer style to a layer, like making the layer lighter or thicker (see Chapter 13

There are lots of very useful Photoshop functions that the beginner may not know about. Here are some that may be useful to you. You can use the Transform tool to resize an image, rotate it, or apply perspective distortion to an object. You can use the Dodge and Burn tools to burn out an image's highlights or darken bright colors. You can use the Free Transform tool to resize a selection area to fill the image. Some more advanced techniques like making your own brushes and combining channels are covered in more detail in the Painter's Brush Book, or the Photoshop Brush Book. Some other cool features include the RapidMask feature for automatically creating stencils and the File Locking feature, which allows two or more applications to access a file at the same time. Photoshop lets you crop, rotate, and resize an image. An image that is too large for the Web may be very difficult to view on your monitor and may distort when opened on a browser. You can crop the image by using the Crop tool, and you can stretch it to a different size using the Free Transform function. Most graphics used on the Web today are created in Photoshop. But many web designers also use other image-editing programs like Pixelmator or GIMP. The Cropping tool makes it easy to trim off a corner of an image. You drag the points around the image, and the size and location of the crop window automatically adapt to suit. You can free transform an image by dragging it around the edges. This feature has no effect when you resize the image using the Free Transform tool. The Crop tool can be used to trim off any part of an image. The Crop tool is like a magnetic puzzle that snaps into place around an object. You drag the Crop tool across the image, and you're left with a puzzle of sections of the image. Drag the Crop tool around the edges of an image to trim off any portion. Hold the Shift key down to keep the crop from moving. You can crop an image using the Crop tool. The Free Transform tool lets you change the size and shape of a selection area. Hold down the Ctrl key and click a point on the image. As you drag, the moving point changes its location in relation to the original image and defines where you wish to move the selection. The Free Transform tool can be used to resize an image

Q: Why does the small metal sphere (less than ~1mm in diameter) produced by green laser find its way to the focal spot? I just spent the last 2 hours or so trying to fix my laptop, I somehow managed to burn my thumb with the power on. I was reminded of a green laser last night in the shower, which I need. Now when I try to turn it on it emits a low pitched buzzing noise before the screen freezes. I tried turning the laser off and on, but it still does not work. It has a small metal sphere (less than ~1mm in diameter), which I tried dropping, pressing it and the battery, nothing worked. After I took the metal sphere out and put it on a piece of paper and moved it around (while keeping the laser off) I noticed a green laser beam coming from the little sphere. This got me thinking, why does it find its way to the focal spot? A: Oh wow. I sure hope you got that little sphere for free. You're looking at a similar situation as the doped fiber amplifier. It also emits a low-pitched noise, at least at low powers, and gets its energy from the power supply. This is not very common for lasers, and it's also not very common for green lasers to be that quiet. I am however sure they are known to exist. This type of problem is rarely seen when you buy lasers for hobby use. The pattern you see is for most likely simply a reflected spot. The laser is actually reflecting at one of the two sides on the glass tube. It does not always cause a problem if it causes an unwanted optical effect. It does if it is however in the high-power regime of a green laser. There are a couple of factors which may cause this. If the laser is aimed at something and only reflected at the end, it may be that the laser itself is not centred in the beam. This of course takes a proper alignment to check. You don't usually notice it in the end result, but in the case of a power laser a misaligned one may cause a misaligned beam. In the case of a green laser there is always a discolouration on the surface of the beam. It is possible that this discolouration is causing the beam to reflect at the side. Both of these would be unlikely, but not impossible. I
